The Terra Nova Expedition

The Terra Nova Expedition was a British expedition to the Antarctic that took place from 1910 to 1913. The expedition was led by Captain Robert Falcon Scott, who had previously led the Discovery Expedition to the Antarctic from 1901 to 1904. The Terra Nova Expedition was Scott's second attempt to reach the South Pole.

The Terra Nova Expedition set sail from Cardiff, Wales, on June 15, 1910. The expedition's ship, the Terra Nova, was a converted whaling vessel. The expedition team consisted of 65 men, including scientists, explorers, and sailors.

The Terra Nova reached the Antarctic on January 4, 1911. The expedition team established a base camp on Ross Island, and from there they began their journey to the South Pole. The team traveled on foot, using sleds to transport their supplies. The journey was arduous and dangerous. The explorers had to contend with extreme cold, high winds, and treacherous ice conditions.

On June 20, 1911, Scott and his team of four explorers reached the South Pole. They were the second group of humans to stand at the bottom of the world, after Roald Amundsen and his team of Norwegian explorers had reached the pole just a month earlier.

The Return Journey

Scott and his team began their return journey from the South Pole on June 21, 1911. The return journey was even more difficult than the journey to the pole. The explorers were exhausted and their supplies were running low. They also faced increasingly bad weather conditions.

On February 11, 1912, Scott and his team reached their base camp on Ross Island. However, they were too weak and exhausted to continue their journey. They died on March 29, 1912, just 11 miles from safety.
