Husserl and the Birth of Phenomenology

Edmund Husserl (1859-1938) is widely regarded as the father of phenomenology, a philosophical movement that emerged in the late 19th century. Husserl sought to develop a new approach to philosophy that would overcome the limitations of traditional empiricism and rationalism.

Inspired by the work of Franz Brentano, Husserl argued that the key to understanding reality lies in studying the intentional structure of consciousness. By focusing on the way in which our consciousness is directed towards objects, we can gain insight into the nature of those objects and the world around us.

The Phenomenological Method

"Sketch for a Phenomenological Description" outlines the basic principles of the phenomenological method. Husserl begins by calling for a radical break with our everyday assumptions and beliefs about the world. This process, known as "bracketing" or "epoché," allows us to focus on the essential structures of consciousness and experience.

Through careful observation and analysis, Husserl identified a number of key features of intentional consciousness. He argued that consciousness is always directed towards an object, and that this object is always present in consciousness in some form. He also distinguished between the "hyle" and the "noesis" of experience, the former referring to the sensory content of experience and the latter to the act of consciousness itself.
